

959
S7853
mir

UC-NRLF

B 3 346 233

MIRIAM

AND

OTHER POEMS

J. HUNT STANFORD

BERKELEY

LIBRARY

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA

Truly yours
John Stanford.

By

J. HUNT STANFORD

"There is a pleasure in poetic pains
Which only poets know."

—Cowper

William Briggs
Publisher
Toronto
1908

ENTERED according to Act of the Parliament of Canada, in the year one thousand nine hundred and eight, by
J. HUNT STANFORD,
at the Department of Agriculture.

759

57853

mic

These Poems,
written in a measure "for want of other idleness," are dedicated to their most indulgent critic—
My Wife.

FOREWORD

AN introduction is scarcely necessary to the poems to be found in the following pages. Most of them have appeared, from time to time, in English and Canadian publications; and while some of them have been kindly received, others have probably passed unread and even unnoticed. What little merit there is in them is no doubt overbalanced by metrical defects, and by Nature's failure to endow me with the "fine frenzy" of the true poet. Such as they are, however, these poems are offered to whoever may be disposed to spare occasional moments in the reading of them, and if I find but a few indulgent and appreciative readers I shall be satisfied.

J. HUNT STANFORD.

Toronto, January, 1908.

CONTENTS

	Page
MIRIAM—A Picture	11
The Altruist	15
The All that Avails	17
The Cult of the Poppy	18
Before an Old Portrait	21
To a Friend	23
My Garden	24
Night and the Morning
I. Out of the Night	27
II. L'Entracte	29
III. Awakening	30
IV. Sunshine	31
V. Assurance	32
To What Shall I Thy Charms Compare?	34
Cleopatra	35
Song of the Snow	36
Lines Written in an English Recreation Ground	37
Cradle Song	39
From the Wharf	40
Love Song	41

Contents

8

	Page
"The Time, the Place, and the Loved One"	42
"Be Not Deceived"	43
Canada is Good Enough for Me (A Song) .. .	44
Læti Triumphantes—The Fall of Pretoria .. .	46
Edward VII.—The Proclamation	48
The Peace of 1902	49
Edward Hanlan	51
Carpe Diem	52
Song. (Written for Music)	53
To a Lady Sighing	54
A Last Word	55

Miriam and Other Poems

MIRIAM: A PICTURE

MIRIAM, your picture haunts me! From my books
 Mine eyes are playing truant; and to eyes
 That fascinate turn frequently. Your looks
 Are fixed upon me, and the light that lies
 Within those orient orbs (more luminous
 Than artist's skill portray'd, and yet it seems
 Not altogether fancied) glows with beams
 Of radiant recognition when I thus
 Responding meet your steadfast scrutinies.
 I lose myself in fathoming the deeps
 That lie half hidden in your wondrous eyes;
 And, gazing long, upon my spirit creeps
 A subtle spell like that which sometimes steals
 On the adoring worshipper who kneels
 In incens'd silence at the sculptur'd shrine
 Of smiling Alma Mater. Fancy-fed
 A life-glow tints your cheeks, and smiles benign
 O'erspread your faultless features; lips bloom red
 As peonies, and bewitchingly suggest
 Luxurious kisses which—like sirens' songs—

Allure but to delude. To you belongs
 Such beauty as would peerlessly invest
 An houri—such as the immortal Fair
 Had look'd upon with rivalry—as might
 Have furnish'd Raphaelle with model rare
 For masterpiece Madonna. Love's own light
 In scintillating splendor all your face
 Illuminates; and for a bright brief space
 The present seems all time, and you and me
 The universe!

But fleeting is the spell:
 The fancy passes, and again I see
 Mere pictur'd loveliness—tho' still a well
 Of inspiration. Eyes that shone so bright
 And searchingly—like those of dæmon-love
 Down glancing from her native sphere above
 This earth-plane—lose their lustre, and their light
 Dissolving leaves but cunning counterfeit.
 Yet still you charm, and other fancies rise—
 Vague dreamings, memories, many a strange conceit
 And many a wild imagining. Your eyes
 Become as windows out through which I gaze
 On other beauty—beauty from the days
 When flourish'd chivalry, the exalted Fair
 Whose moods sway'd empires, heart-thron'd queens of song
 And heroines of history. The air
 Fills fast with phantoms; and a shadowy throng
 Of Limbo's Fairest fascinous flits by.
 I cannot name the thousand shapes that glide
 Before me; nor express the love, the pride,
 The virtues, graces, charms, divinity
 I see exemplified. Yet some there are

Who shine amidst this pageant of the Fair
 As shine Canopus and Canicula
 Amidst the lesser suns ; whose beauty rare,
 Whose deeds, whose love, whose nobleness, whose fame
 Clings longest to the memory, and who claim
 The homage of the ages. Foremost there
 I greet fair Helen, and with her the roll
 Of HoMER's music on the listening air
 Reverberates, and in my dream-drown'd soul
 Heroic fire enkindles. There I see
 The Sestos priestess whom Leander lov'd ;
 And she who over all temptations prov'd
 Victorious—the chaste Penelope.
 Then, in a clearer light, the beauteous Queen
 Of Egypt—bride of Love and Death ; and she Whose sceptre sway'd Palmyra, and between
 This twain that British Queen whose memory
 E'er makes the blood run tingling thro' the veins,
 Who fought to free her people from the chains
 Of Roman slavery. And then I see
 Fair Rosamond. Godiva, Antoinette,
 Jeanne d'Arc, Elizabeth of Hungary,
 The Cenci's daughter, Denmark's Margaret,
 And three immortalized by poets' lyre
 And passion—Leonora, Beatrice,
 And Petrarch's Laura. Thus the artifice
 Of Fancy fashions dreams which you inspire,
 And thus you move me !
 In the days
 Of Faith, 'tis said that certain sculptur'd saints
 Were oft endowed with life ; and when the gaze
 Of kneeling worshippers, shriv'd from the taints
 Of sin by good confession, to them turn'd

(While yet the holy fire within them burn'd),
The saintly eyes would light with heavenly beams
And lips would move in benison. It seems
Your picture, Miriam, has a such-like power;
And yet I know it is but painter's skill
That so enriches it. This to your dower
Of loveliness—which thus doth pleasing fill
My idle moments with fair dreams—and this
To Art and Womanhood a tribute is!

THE ALTRUIST

“Religion . . . is this: to visit the fatherless and widows in their tribulation.”—James 1. 27.

You love your fellow-man; your heart with gladness
 hails his joy,
 And with compassion seeks to soothe his misery. You turn
 The eye of pity to the poor; scornest the oppressor;
 And the oppress'd ne'er vainly ask your sympathy.
 You love
 The weakling stronger than the strong; and to the fatherless
 A foster-father's patronage e'er readily bequeath.
 And yet they call you Infidel! The churches have you set
 Without the pale; and have a ban (O matchless mockery!)
 Upon you plac'd. With bell and book and candle, cross and stole,
 You excommunicated stand! Yet I would risk my soul
 And all its future heritage in company with yours.

What if the all you do dispute be true, will God condemn
For faulty faith an honest man and clement? Goodness is
As goodness does, and Charity is greatest of the Three!
I wist not all the credos sung or said in Christendom
Did more avail than meanest act of kindness. Faith and Doubt
Are one—both start where Knowledge ends—but Love is all in all!
If Heaven be true, for such as you alone (despite the creeds,
The churches, the anathemas they fling) must heaven
exist;
If Karma, then the babe who now within the womb of Time
Awaits your dying, whose first breath is sequel to your last,
Will tread the surer in the path Nirvana terminates:
If neither, and the end of man is but a going home
To Mother Nature—dreamless sleep within her bosom, earth
To earth returning—still you bless for ever and are blest!
There springs from kindliness and love a noble happiness
And subtle peace that fills the Now with softest melody;
And for Hereafter procreates such blessed influence
Which Time, destroyer of most else, can ne'er destroy.
Thus blest
And blessing, let your doubts prevail—what odds? The gods that be
Must ever venerate a man who loves his fellow-man!

THE ALL THAT AVAILS

GIVE me the light and the laughter of Love, and the world may withhold me the rest;
 Let me the whole of the strength of my soul in the service Love asketh invest;
 Let me drink down to the dregs of Love's draught thro'
 the best to bitterest taste;
 Let me toil on till life's journey is done if for Love I
 my energies waste.

All that I have and the all that is mine in the years that are destined to be,
 Laurels and Fame, be they mine, I will name as a tribute I yield, Love, to thee;
 All that the gods in indulgence may give, and the guer-
 don which merit may gain—
 Nought I refuse of the all that accrues from the work of the hand or the brain.

Love is the lamp that enlightens and guides thro' the gloom when the skies are o'ercast;
 Love will befriend to the bitterest end, and will all other virtues outlast;
 Love will instruct me to live as I ought, and will shrive
 of the sins I confess;
 Then will sustain when the powers of life wane, and when dying will comfort and bless.

THE CULT OF THE POPPY

(Written after reading De Quincey's Confessions.)

THE opium works! I feel its magic spell
 Soft stealing on my senses, and a swell
 Of rhythmic heart-beats bears my soul afar
 Upon a dreamy sea. Across the bar
 As with a tide I drift till all the shore
 Where I embark'd is visible no more.
 Warm languid breezes sing to me and sink
 In lulling cadences; while on the brink
 Of sleep I hover—flush'd with fearful joys—
 And trance-like held in mystic equipoise.
 Mine eyelids droop; and sweet forgetfulness
 Of time and place, of travail, and the stress
 Of life's wild warfare on my spirit falls;
 And purple vapors rise in glowing walls
 Of opalescent grandeur, in whose shade
 The world that is, with all its care, is laid.
 Soft music, as from low Eolian lyres
 In throbbing unison with unseen quires
 Of Seraphim, upon the perfum'd air
 Is gently borne; and round me everywhere
 Its echoes linger till earth, sky and sea
 Vibrate with soporific harmony.

Voluptuous visions luringly arise;
And phantom'd Beauty—which enchanted eyes
Alone dare gaze upon—before me glide:
Fair forms by Fancy and Romance supplied
From an unveiling Wonderland. A joy
Beyond expression, peace without alloy,
A rapture which I almost fear to feel
Possesses me; and makes the hours I steal
From dreary earth-life, with the drug's dread aid,
Experiences of heaven which men have pray'd
To earn and enter; but which can alone
By grace-girt Death and Opium be won.

AFTERMATH.

Distress'd by demons from the lurid lands
Of a loathsome hell, once more with trembling hands
I lift the smouldering pipe to eager lips;
And wait the working of the charm that grips
My soul and body in imperious power.
It is not now, howe'er, as in that hour
When first I made the drug to my weak will Enchanter. True, there come the visions still,
And still the magic music do I hear;
But now mine ears are dull, my sight less clear;
My mind to torments turbulent a prey.
The visions fair fast dissipate: the grey
Has long since hid the purple, and the songs
With shrieks and groans are broken. Hideous throngs
Of frenzied freaks the fleeting Beauties press;
And oft I cry aloud with wild distress
At some o'er-fearful form in threatening guise
That fascinates the while it terrifies.

The Cult of the Poppy

O that I could this baneful bondage break!
That Nature might forgive, and from me take
The penalty she unforgetting gave—
That I might rise and be no longer slave!
Too late! The retribution must be made:
Too long have I deliverance delay'd.
In taking heaven by storm I sink accurst:
O Death, come soon, or madness must come first.

BEFORE AN OLD PORTRAIT

THE suns of many summers
 Their changeless course have sped
 Since thus thou smil'd, a merry child,
 To maiden pleasures wed;
 The light of life's bright morning
 Shone then within thine eyes;
 And clouds of care o'ershadowed ne'er
 The lustre of thy skies.

One pleasing panorama
 The world appeared to thee;
 All things of earth were springs of mirth,
 And life all liberty.
 Thy soul laved in the freshness
 That blew with every wind;
 Thy heart was free from love and me,
 And passionless thy mind.

But now maturer fancies
 Engage the passing hour,
 The tender bud of womanhood
 Hath blossomed into flower.

Before An Old Portrait

Demurer looks—love wistful—
Illuminate thine eyes,
And girlish grace hath yielded place
To grace that dignifies.

I gaze on this sweet picture,
And contemplate with pride
The promise fair of beauty rare
Divinely verified.
A princess here thou smilest,
A queen thou art to-day,
And love confest within thy breast
Is sceptre to thy sway.

Yet oft with waves of sadness
Thy heart now overflows,
For thou hast found that thorns abound
Where blooms love's choicest rose.
And tho' thy soul is often
With strange, wild raptures thrill'd,
These later years have brought thee tears
Which maiden eyes ne'er fill'd.

The life that love hath widen'd
For sorrow widens, too;
The tempests rise most fierce in skies
Most bright with summer's hue.
Great grief is e'er the portion
Of hearts great love have known;
Who dare aspire to steal heaven's fire
Must for the theft atone.

O! Peerless She, whose glories
Inspire these rugged rhymes,
From care set free thou ne'er wilt be
As in those olden times;
Yet love is best forever,
Ah, yes! despite its pains!
The joys of earth have transient worth,
But Love half heaven contains.

TO A FRIEND

WHEN first I clasped your hand I straightway knew
That we had met and walk'd as friends before.
Some unsuspected memory, which Death's door
Had long since clos'd upon and hitherto
Lay waiting wizard-touch, reviv'd anew;
Bridging the silent years that score on score
Lay laps'd 'tween birth and birth; and proving true
The faith within me—or, at least, the more Confirming it. Be this, tho', as it may
(And to dispute it you the last will be),
This truth remains which none can e'er gainsay:
Not fame, nor gifts, nor gold, nor lordly lands
Can vie with Friendship's tested constancy,
Or match the riches Friend by Friend commands.

MY GARDEN

I LIKE my garden best at night,
 When thro' the gently quivering trees—
 Rustling responsive to the breeze—
 The lone moon sheds her chequer'd light.

I like it best when stillness reigns;
 When from the branches overhead
 The throstle and the finch have fled,
 And only memory hears their strains.

When all the worry, all the care
 Of day's vicissitude is o'er;
 When from the distant town no more
 The traffic's drone disturbs the air.

'Tis then I love to wander round
 Its paths with meditative pace;
 Where 'neath the trees the moonbeams trace
 Fantastic shapes upon the ground.

In those blest hours the thoughts of day,
 And Time and Place all disappear;
 I roam in an enchanted sphere
 And Fancy 'luminates the way.

I people then my garden fair
 With lov'd ones who from distance rise,
 And from the past: the friends I prize,
 Whose lives and loves 'twere joy to share.

They come, these phantoms of the night,
 And crowd around me in the dews;
 They come, the invited of the Muse,
 Resuscitating past delight.

Nor come they silent, but with low
 Sweet voices tell of other days
 When side by side in far-off ways
 We wandered—hearts with hope aglow.

Hopes and ambitions they revive,
 Point to the laurels to be won;
 They chide me for the little done,
 Yet give me strength again to strive.

They sing again the joyous songs
 So often sang for our heart's ease.
 When days are dark such hours as these
 My fancy flies to and prolongs.

The fragrance of the fields one brings,
 And tells of sport on mead and mere;
 Another with a zeal sincere
 Speaks: "Art is long, but Time hath wings."

Here, too, the chosen Three I greet;
 And live again the hours when we
 Drank deep the wine of poesy,
 And brought the bards to judgment-seat.

The Ploughman's songs we read once more;
And, finding music in each note,
The laurell'd Tennyson we quote,
And over our lov'd Browning pore.

The line draws out; and here I see
The friends of darkest doubting days,
The friends who taught me Wisdom's ways
And help'd to many a victory.

.

Thus in the perfum'd hours of eve
Oft thro' the sleeping flowers I move;
And, fancy-fann'd, from those I love
Soul-stimulating strength receive.

O blest Imagination wed
With happy Memory! thine aid
Brings friends from far to this still shade
And breathes new life e'en to the dead.

CHELMSFORD, ENG., 1900.

NIGHT AND THE MORNING

I.—OUT OF THE NIGHT.

ALONE

I sit: the smoke from mine enchanted pipe
 Curls up in random ringlets, each the frame
 Of thy fair face by fancy miniatur'd.
 The house is still; and, save the dismal wind
 That wails a monody thro' neighboring trees,
 No other sound breaks in to interpose
 The blest quiescence of my reverie.
 "No other sound," I said; yet as the saints
 In moments of divinest ecstasy
 Have heard some rapturous fragments of the songs
 The angels sing, so hear I now thy voice.
 Dear soft, sad voice! How oft is tremulous tones,
 Inspir'd by those sweet sorrows which thy heart
 Doth hold in almost duplicate with mine,
 Have echo'd thro' the cloisters of my soul—
 Uplifting me—and for a transient space
 Resuscitating all the darling hopes
 Of days long dead, ere yet had Fate despoil'd
 The idols I once lov'd and made mine own.

Dear voice! dear eyes! ah, those rare-radiant eyes!
Their burning beams have oft-times pierc'd my dark
Like sunbeams straying in the silent aisles
Of some dead Faith—some deep cathedral gloom.
You move me as no woman did before:
Your heart strikes chords responding to mine own;
And in the fitful harmony I hear
(Or seem to hear) some far-borne echoings
Of half-remembered music—phantom sounds
Defying all defining—echoings,
It may be, of the symphonies that swell
Thro' sun-tipp'd heights where stand the courts of Love.
We two are lonely—lonely in a land
Where hateful crowds forever come and go;
Where hearts seem out of tune; where every eye
That turns to look on us leers mockingly;
Where nothing is, and all things seem to be.
Yes! it is loneliness indeed to feel
Exotic spirits on this sunless shore—
By all misunderstood and only part
The other understanding. Yet be strong;
And let me take thy hand. Perchance it be
That in the night which blackens out our sky
Some star may shine which shall heaven's presence prove—
Some god-fixed beacon whose refulgent rays
Shall cheer our hearts and guide us thro' the gloom.
Perchance it be (for Hope still leads the quest)
That with thy hand in mine the rosy shafts
Of Love's bright morning may upon us gleam—
Who knows?
The darkest hour doth e'er prelude the dawn!

II.—L'ENTRACTE.

How went that act? Methought it over-long
And strangely wearisome. The parts we play'd
(Oft play'd before with confidence and ease)
Seem'd all too light for heavy hearts like ours.
I know the play must on; the prompter's voice
Too soon indeed will call us to the stage
To speak our lines, and with accustom'd art
Make false seem true and truth seem falsity.
Yet, while the lights are low, draw near awhile;
Sit here—take off thy mask. I'll doff my robe
Of hateful motley—throw aside these bells—
Dismiss the acted past, and, flush'd with faith,
Will stake my future on the instant Now.
See—now we are ourselves—alone, unseen;
Give me thy hand and look into mine eyes,
Weigh well my lightest word, for from this hour
The future radiates, and moments now
Are big with destiny. Light of my soul!
In honor's name and virtue's (which are thine!)
I offer thee a love too long restrain'd,
Too long, long held in leashes; silent long,
Yet growing fairer with each silent hour,
Like a flower that blooms in wooded solitude.
Speech is too impotent this love to tell,
Words are not coin'd that can its depths define;
I can but lisp it haltingly, and trust
To thy sweet understanding. Yet, dear heart,
Lest some faint doubt should linger in thy soul
(Which from the darkness sprang to light with mine),
This truth rehearse—that love from passion purg'd,
Whose king is Mind, whose enemy Desire,

Is all too noble to be bound by chains
Of time and circumstance. Believe this true,
That all my dreams are realized in thee,
That thou alone canst turn to day my night,
That thou alone canst crown my hopes with joy,
My faith with certitude. Light of my soul,
The die is yours to cast! Full ripe grows now
The fruit of our past Karma; pluck or leave;
Love teaches me to trust you utterly.

You whisper hope! The vista of the years
Glow rosily, and ends in blazing light!
Now to the stage again, to win fresh cheers—
I'll play with new-found confidence to-night.

III.—AWAKENING.

Our words became less frequent, till at last
All speech was useless. Motionless you stood
Before me; thrall'd me with a look that pass'd
Like lightning through my soul and stirr'd the blood
Till every fibre of my being thrill'd
With wakening tremors. Then, somehow, it seem'd
As though the rippling of the brook was still'd,
As though the moon with softer radiance beam'd,
As though a sudden silence held the earth
Expectant, while the arching heavens bent near
In seeming benediction. All the dearth
Of loveless years, the want of things held dear,
The fruitless yearnings of a lonely life
Were instantly forgotten; and my hands
Sought yours in gratitude for ended strife.

Words now were wanting; but the mute demands
Love made were answered with a clinging kiss

Wherein souls mingled; and I knew you mine
Forever and forever. The abyss

'Twixt heaven and earth was bridg'd for me, and thine

Angelic presence—radiant as a light

That shineth in the darkness—made all clear
The way of my salvation.

Saints delight

In contemplating joys they find not here;
Their Paradise lies after life is done;

But I—more blest than they—by Love's sweet aid,
Have enter'd mine, and glory's crown have won

In life's high noon-time—even while they pray'd!!

IV.—SUNSHINE.

Into the deepening darkness of my life

Thy glory casts its piercing ray,

And—like the promises of May,

That throw forgetfulness o'er winter's strife—

The light of love that beam'd

Into my yearning heart from out thine own

My happiness redeem'd,

And thro' the yielding clouds there brightly shone

The summer's sun.

Naught have I crav'd of wealth or men's regard,

Nor hath ambition sear'd my heart,

I sought of life the better part—

Ask'd but for love, and hop'd but love's reward.

Yet, phantom-like and fair,

Love all-alluring, e'er delusive seem'd;
Unheeded was my prayer,
No ray of hope across my pathway gleam'd
From cloud-hid sun.

But on a sudden thro' the gathering gloom
In glowing radiance thou appear'd;
Entranc'd I gaz'd—yet almost fear'd
To trust what might prove hope's recurring doom.
Still, spite of fear, I leapt,
And at thy bosom found my heart's desire;
For very joy I wept
As o'er my soul there shone with rays of fire
Love's golden sun!

V.—ASSURANCE.

Once was a time—the while our love was new,
When earth seem'd dreamland, and each breath I drew
Was drawn half timorous lest its violence prove
The dread awakening from a dream of love—
Like some grim spectre haunting me by night,
And like some shapeless shadow which the light
Of morning darken'd, came to me the thought
That I might live to lose the love that brought
To life completeness and to earth a heaven.
I did not doubt the love so sweetly given,
Nor deem you even faintly insincere;
Still, spite of all you pledg'd, there rose the fear
That on some sunless someday I should learn
You lov'd me, dear, no longer; and would turn
Your eyes from me as from unworthiness.
Forgive the doubtings which I now confess;

Blame not faintheartedness, but rather prize
The fervent love that could such woes devise.
Did I not love so dearly, doubts like these
Would be like summer clouds, which merest breeze—
Warm-breathing from the south—would soon disperse,
And leave clear sunlight through my universe.
These doubts are gone; the prospect of the years
That wait before me to my sight appears
Endow'd with joyous hope, for there I see
Divine assurance of your constancy.
As I am yours, so you, I know, are mine—
Mine own thro' weal and woe, tho' Fates combine
Against us all our dearest hopes to blight;
Mine own beyond all life, beyond the night
That curtains off life's day, and mine to be
When time shall merge into eternity.

TO WHAT SHALL I THY CHARMS
COMPARE?

DEAREST, to what shall I thy charms compare?
To some o'er-beauteous morn that brightens eyes
With vigil weary? Dawn so wondrous fair
On earth's horizon never yet did rise
As that which rose with thee in my grey skies.

Shall I compare thee to the summer's dower
Of bloom and fragrance? Blossoms fade away,
And fragrance with them dies. There's not a flower
In all of earth's magnificent display
That rivals thee; thou art more fair than they.

Shall I compare thee to a setting sun,
That gilds with gorgeous glory all the west?
Not till my life's devoted course is run
Will thy sun set; and while with thy love blest,
Glory and light are always manifest.

Shall I compare thee to a song divine
By some sweet singer sung to cheer a heart
Which hath become world-weary? Love like thine
Is sweeter far than music's magic art;
The song must cease—thy love will ne'er depart.

My Muse deserts me, striving to compare
Thy charm, thy love, with aught the world doth prize;
Peerless thou art, with each day grown more fair,
Lov'd more and more with every hour that flies.
How, then, can words thy worth to me apprise?

CLEOPATRA

Gods I defy! the laws and punishments of man
I laugh to scorn! The world's respect or calumny
Weigh lightly with me; and I dare to mock the ban
By cold-soul'd Prudence set on love of such degree
As that which fires and feeds our erstwhile starving hearts.

Give me that kiss again: that kiss which first imparts
New life to me and then absorbs it till I fall
All powerless on your bosom, trembling thro' and thro'
As with expiring ecstasies. All, Roman, all
I am or have or ever hoped for (save but you)
I willingly surrender. Kiss me, nor yet refrain:
Lo! yielding all, the all of life I gain!

SONG OF THE SNQW

LIGHT as the down on the white swan's breast—
 Light as lies gull on a wave at rest—
 Light as a cloud on a mountain's crest—
 On the earth lies the beautiful snow.

Garbing the glebe with an argent sheet—
 Glistening gay on the lamp-lit street—
 Crispily yielding to silent feet—
 Lies the snow—the beautiful snow.

Never a maiden, I boldly declare,
 With her ropes of pearls and her jewel'd hair,
 And her gown of silk or of satin rare,
 Was array'd in a raiment half so fair
 As the earth with the beautiful snow.

Sweet are the blossoms and breath of the spring,
 Great are the glories the summer days bring,
 Autumn's luxuriance others will sing,
 But winter, to me, of the annular ring
 Is the gem—with its beautiful snow!

LINES WRITTEN IN AN ENGLISH RECREATION GROUND

CALL these the Children's Acres! All around
On sun-kist lawns and blossom-border'd ground
 The little ones at play
 Keep happy holiday.

We watch them at their games and feel their gladness;
Their joy, reflecting, banishes our sadness;
 We hear their shouts of glee
 And share their gaiety.

No thoughts of toil and care, no weight of sorrow,
No troubled apprehensions of to-morrow,
 Their youthful mirth restrains—
 Here only pleasure reigns.

Here, too, doth Nature wear a festal cope
Of flaming flowers—a rich kaleidoscope
 Of blending greens and blues,
 Purples and saffron hues.

The shimmering river 'neath the willow's shade,
As tho' 'twere loth to leave this sylvan glade,
 With an unwilling tide
 Flows lazily beside.

38 Written in an English Recreation Ground

Ambrosial zephyrs play amongst the trees,
The woodbirds' carol floats on every breeze,
And splendent is the scene
With mingling shade and sheen.

No noise or danger of the busy street
Can reach this calm sequestered retreat,
And, children, of these meads
You hold the title-deeds!

Yet scarce a charm without you have these bowers,
For you are sweeter far than all the flowers—
More fair than blossoms new
That e'en in Eden grew.

Well spake the sainted Gregory of old
When such as you were in Rome's market sold—
"Angels, not Angles." Yea!
Those words are true to-day.

Dear ones, play on! Enjoy the passing hours;
Heed not the voices which from neighboring towers
Proclaim the moments flying—
Heed not the blossoms dying:

Too soon the beauty and the dream will fade,
Too soon these lawns will be in shadow laid;
Make most of glad To-day,
Deem youth will last for aye!

CRADLE SONG

SLEEP, baby, sleep.
Mother beside thy cot,
Proud in her happy lot,
Her watch will keep.
While o'er thy form so fair—
Guarding with tender care—
Angels my vigil share;
Sleep, baby, sleep.

Rest, baby, rest.
Day now is almost done,
And the departing sun
Sinks to the west.
Gold in the grey sky gleams,
Stars with their timorous beams
Light to the Land of Dreams,
Rest, baby, rest.

Sleep, baby, sleep.
Homeward the birds have flown,
Shadows have deeper grown,
Rest, then, and sleep.
Girt with thy mother's love,
Watch'd from the skies above,
Safe as storm-sheltered dove,
Sleep, baby, sleep.

FROM THE WHARF

To R. P. AND A. H., OCT., 1903.

Lost in a maze of love-created dreaming
 Lonely I stand and see
 The fair morn's sunlight on the waters gleaming,
 As o'er the Lake the white-wall'd boat is steaming,
 Bearing you far from me.

Wider the waste dividing us is growing,
 Wider as grows the day;
 Full of sad thoughts I watch you southward going,
 Wishing you back—yet comforted in knowing
 Love links our hearts for aye.

Kinsfolk, farewell! to guardian gods commending
 Your lives—close knit with mine—
 I homeward turn, a pensive Muse attending,
 Yet many a lingering love-glance backward sending
 Where eyes responsive shine.

LOVE SONG

My dearest, let me hold your hand,
And let me look into your eyes,
For all the riches of the land
And all that of this world we prize
Are to your charms compar'd but dross—
Your love by far outweighs their loss.

And, dearest, to this loyal breast
Your faultless form let me embrace;
Nor check the kisses fondly prest
Upon your love-illumin'd face.
Not earth's best gifts, nor heaven's above,
Would I exchange for your dear love.

Yes, dearest, you are better far
Than lavish wealth or proud renown;
You are my life's resplendent star,
My hope's security and crown;
My best delight, my jewel rare,
Blest object of my tenderest care!

And, dearest, when this life is o'er,
And thro' the darkness lies our way,
I'll clasp your hand and ask once more
Your trust till dawns eternal day.
The life that lies beyond must prove
The consummation of our love.

"THE TIME, THE PLACE, AND THE LOVED ONE"

ONCE, long ago, dear, while as friends we parted,
 Within thine eyes I saw the love-light shine;
 I felt its glow, dear, and it straightway started
 Fires ne'er since quench'd and passion half-divine.

'Twas but a glance, dear, and a soft word spoken,
 Only a hand-clasp, when thou didst depart;
 Yet with that glance, dear, self-repose was broken,
 And with that hand-clasp all enslav'd my heart.

'Tis strange, yet sweet, dear, that the soul's affection
 Can thus be rous'd into tempestuous swirl,
 And strange how soon, dear, comes that one's subjection,
 Who finds at once the Time, the Place, the Girl.

L'ENVOY.

Thee by my side, dear, in the ingle seated,
 The "bairns" asleep—dismiss'd the world's wild whirl—
 Our daily tasks, dear, once again completed—
 I find anew the Time, the Place, the Girl.

“ BE NOT DECEIVED ”

BE not deceiv'd ; this is the truth supreme :

“ What ye shall sow ye in like measure reap ”—
No more, no less ! It is a dangerous dream

Devis'd in ages wrapt in darkness deep
That “ death in grace ” brings everlasting bliss,
And hell eternal waits a life remiss.

“ What ye shall sow ye reap ”—the scales are true ;
And so much for your so much will they yield.

Attempt no bribe ; nor think to e'er undo

The evil done, or cancel sin conceal'd,
Or 'scape the penalty of dire desires
By aught but purging Retribution's fires.

Nor think that in a lifetime you can sow

Good seed sufficient lasting heaven to gain ;
Death is but night-time ; and the morn will show

New duties, and new conquests to attain.
Yet weary not—you go from height to height ;
Be strong and fearless, follow Truth and Right.

The glories of the gods can yours be made,

But by yourselves can these be gain'd alone ;
The merits of another will not aid,

Nor sacrificial rites for sin atone.
The Path is strait, yet flowers adorn the way ;
And morn breaks brighter there with each new day.

CANADA IS GOOD ENOUGH FOR ME *

A SONG.

YOU may sing about the countries with a European name,

You may praise the picturesqueness of the East;
You may tell of Southern glories, Afric's ancient worth proclaim;

You may even boast of lands I love the least!
You may play upon my sentiment, extol to me the Isle
Which you proudly name the "Mistress of the Sea,"
But I tell you with conviction, and I tell it with a smile,
That young Canada is good enough for me!

Chorus—

Yes, this Canada is good enough for me!
'Tis a land that breeds the stalwart and the free!
And I hold in veneration
This ambitious little nation,
For young Canada is good enough for me!

She may have no conquering army; she may boast no
fighting fleet;

She may never rear a Nelson or a Drake;
She may gain no warlike glory, but she'll never be effete—

There's a grander grade of glory she will take!

* Set to music by Alfred J. Rostance, of Toronto.

In the farm and field and market will her victories be won,

And her councils will of peace the councils be ;
She's a country with a history auspiciously begun,
And young Canada is good enough for me !
Yes, this Canada, etc.

'Tis a land where Nature hoarded wealth and wonder yet untold

For the Nation which she knew one day would be ;
'Tis a land whose choicest riches are the prairie's waving gold,

And the argosies she sends to every sea.
'Tis a land whose aristocracy are tillers of the soil,
And whose rulers from the scourge of sloth are free ;
'Tis a land that seeks her heroes in the ranks of those who toil,

And young Canada is good enough for me !
Yes, this Canada, etc.

LÆTI TRIUMPHANTES

THE FALL OF PRETORIA.

HARK to the shouts of gladness!
 Hark to the throbbing bells
 Pealing delight
 With brazen might,
 While o'er each vale and plain and height
 The song of triumph swells.

Join with the strain your voices,
 Make all the welkin ring!
 Let the glad sound
 Re-echo round,
 Let it from heart to heart rebound—
 One grand Te Deum sing!

Welcome the hour of triumph!
 Welcome the victory won!
 Hail with a shout
 The foemen's rout!
 Breastwork, entrenchment, fort, redoubt,
 Are gallantly o'erthrown!

Nor hail alone the conquest
 Achiev'd by Britons' might—
 Hail the first ray
 Of breaking day,
 When war shall cease and peace shall sway,
 When darkness yields to light!

Near draws the consummation
 Of war's distressful strife;
 Soon will be o'er
 The cannons' roar,
 Soon shall we need to mourn no more
 The sacrifice of life!

Sing, then, with exultation,
 And let the merry bells
 Clash with delight,
 With brazen might,
 While o'er each vale and plain and height
 The song triumphant swells!

June 6, 1900.

THE PROCLAMATION

EDWARD VII.

THE herald's voice rang out, "God save the King!"
 We heard the shout; and thro' our tears we smil'd.
 Strange how our grief with joy was reconcil'd
 At that new cry! O Death, where is thy sting?
 The Empire liveth still and draws new breath,
 Even while shadow'd by thy wings, dark Death!
 Tear-stricken souls, ye honor not the Dead*
 By weeping and by moaning only. Come,
 Fresh courage take! Let not your lips be dumb
 To songs of gladness—raise each drooping head;
 Uplift your hearts and sing,
 "Heaven bless and save the King."
 New 'life, new hopes, new aspirations spring
 Within us; and from darkest night
 We merge into a morning's light.
 Heaven bless'd the Queen: pray now "Heaven bless the King."

* Queen Victoria.

THE PEACE OF 1902

FROM Afric's southern shores the message flash'd—
“Peace is proclaim'd!” The spark that raced
Beneath the ocean's breast made haste
The tidings to deliver. Wild waves dash'd

And lash'd the rocks above in frantic glee,
While thro' the blue the sea-winds sang,
And to the skies the echoes rang
In peal on peal of growing ecstasy.

Wildly the glad news broke upon the land,
And strangely thrill'd the hearts that heard;
No sanguine triumph yet had stirr'd
Our race-proud souls with rapture half so grand.

“Peace is proclaimed!” Fast sped the news, and wide
The swelling tide of gladness roll'd;
Tho' yesterday the bells had toll'd
With grief—to-day they palpitate with pride.

The Empire's myriad cities breathe delight,
And juvenescence everywhere
Obtains: Hosannas fill the air,
And pulses quicken, hearts beat fast, and eyes grow bright.

The soldier's mother heard those peace bells ring.

“My boy will soon be home,” she cried;

“I'll search no more 'mongst those who died
In terror of the tears his name would bring.”

The lonely wife heard, too, that message blest;

O, who can speak the bliss it brings

To her tried heart? With joy she sings,
And proudly clasps his children to her breast.

“Peace is proclaim'd!” Father and friend and son

From war's dread strife are freed at last:

No more the battle-bugle's blast

Will sound: the sword is sheath'd, its work is done.

Yet thro' the gladsome tumult breaks the wail

Of widow'd hearts and minds distrest;

“Robb'd of the ones we lov'd the best,
What unto us that mourn can peace avail?”

We hear thy moaning, but, O hearts opprest,

Let sympathy give comfort birth;

The dead died heroes, and their worth
From pole to pole resounds—from East to West!

Their deeds shall be engrav'd upon the scrolls

Of Britain's glory, and each name

Shall live endow'd with deathless fame;
Their memory lov'd while live heroic souls.

EDWARD HANLAN

DIED JAN. 4, 1908.

IN the world's infancy, when might was right,
And the grim sword was arbiter supreme,
As its chief heroes mankind did esteem
Its warrior-victors, men of martial might,
Its splendid Sauls, and lords of bloody fight.
Laurels and fame were theirs—their deeds the theme
Of song and story which the old would cite
Their children to inspire. We would redeem
This barbarous past: and to such happy end
We seek the victors who on mead and mere
In manly sport did honorably contend,
And hail them heroes worthy gala-day.
Great amongst such was he around whose bier
We sorrowing stand, and sad last homage pay.

CARPE DIEM

FLING your sorrows to the wind!
 Brood, and they grow more deep;
 Let not grief distress the mind—
 Better to work than weep!

Melancholy is Folly's child,
 Bred in the mind deform'd,
 Foster'd in the heart defiled—
 The heart to life ne'er warm'd!

Grief a worm is in the bud
 Of life's sun-seeking flower;
 Left to thrive, 'twill canker good
 With ever-growing power.

Seek the light—the darkness shun!
 Heed not the pensive themes!
 Turn your hearts toward the sun—
 Absorb its blessed beams!

Life is short; then let us seek
 Its fulness to enjoy!
 Let us frustrate Folly's freak,
 And discontent destroy!

SONG

(Written for music.)

O LOVE, come love, sighs and tears are folly!

Why should you and I repine?

Brighter skies will never shine,

I am yours and you are mine,

Then, my love, why mope with melancholy?

Love that sulks can breed no hero,

Come and join the gay bolero;

Trip and play,

Make holiday,

Clap the castanets with me and sing alway,

Love is mirth and music, love is laughter,

Love will bless to-day and bless hereafter,

Happy, then, thrice happy are the hearts that love!

Then love, dear love, what's the use of repining?

Let me kiss those tears away,

Take you to my arms and say

"Sweet, I'll love but you for aye"—

To a Lady Sighing

Ah, again your eyes with glee are shining!
Now come dance amongst the lightest,
Make of days to-day the brightest,
Scatter care,
And everywhere
Make the welkin ring with songs that scout despair.

Love is mirth and music, love is laughter,
Love will bless to-day and bless hereafter,
Happy, then, thrice happy are the hearts that love!

TO A LADY SIGHING

WHY are thy looks of sadness eloquent,
And why have smiles quite vanish'd from thy face?
Thy constant sighings to my heart have sent
A pang of pity which evolves apace
To love-born misery.

Is it that thou hast found some cherish'd friend
Unworthy of a trust thou didst confide?
Is it that broken hopes thy heart doth rend?
Or is that heart a home where doth abide
A love-born misery?

A LAST WORD

HE who of Love oft sang, and touch'd his lyre
With fingers tingling with the subtle thrills
Bright eyes create and kisses given inspire,
Who fram'd with faulty words the song that fills
The universe with music deem'd divine,
Still would of Love be minstrel ; and each day
Would morning gather'd garlands bring and lay
As gifts of gratitude upon Love's shrine.
The mellowing years have slow'd the pulse of youth,
And eyes reflect less brightly passion's pride ;
Yet year on year still clearer glows the truth
That Love is life's chief good and life's best guide.
In joy and sorrow blest alike is he
Who yields to Love a fearless fealty.

